

MMPH6170 Resources for Health (Summer Semester)

Coordinator: Dr Ravi Rannan-Eliya

Course Description:

This course analyses the origins and flow of resources through health systems. The course begins with an overview of health financing, including revenue generation, risk pooling, and purchasing. It then discusses the production of health, the productivity of health care, and the major drivers of growth in health expenditures. Adopting a universal health coverage framework, the course then discusses how resources are important to achieving both coverage of essential health services and financial protection in health. Basic economic theories of supply and demand will also be covered to enhance the students' understanding of the underlying economic mechanisms affecting the performance of health systems. Student will also learn about the importance of non-financial resources ( i.e. human resources and health technologies) in the production of healthcare and the financing of public health systems. Tutorials will cover obtaining health resource data, tracking health expenditures, measuring financial protection, calculating equity, and monitoring progress towards UHC in Hong Kong. Finally, the political economy of improving the availability of resources in a health system will also be discussed.
